	Abstract
	Any individual success in life, whether personal or professional, is seldom a product of one's own individualized growth with no help from others. TRUST IS THE ULTIMATE VALUE IN THE MENTORMENTEE RELATIONSHIP The ultimate goal in a mentor-mentee relationship is trust. Modern organizations have realized the value to employees of strong mentor-mentee relationships to share knowledge, multiply experience and communicate organizational values. 	Invest time in your mentor or mentee for success Any individual success in life, whether personal or professional, is seldom a product of one's own individualized growth with no help from others. Few people develop in a bubble without influence-whether positive or negative-from others. Nonetheless, in many professions, including law, succeeding independently is viewed as a sign of real success or strength, and people are often reluctant to acknowledge the need for mentoring.
	In reality, an individual's fully developed and realized version, both professionally and personally, is not preordained or necessarily static and can greatly benefit from an effective mentor. "Mentor" is a term often used generically to describe a number of different developmental influences in a person's life; but the first step to successfully finding or being a mentor is understanding what it is and what it is not.
	HOW TO MAKE AN IMPACT AS A MENTOR: KNOWING THE DIFFERENCE BETWEEN MENTORS, ROLE MODELS, LEADERS AND TEACHERS
	A mentor is different than a role model. A role model tends to be someone you look up to and try to emulate. This may be a person you know or a person from history. A role model is not necessarily someone with whom you have a close personal relationship, but they may
